

This comment is AGAINST the proposed change in the current rule in regard to wireless air-to-ground communications. Although I work for a very large wireless handset manufacturer, I also travel nearly 100k miles/year on airlines and cannot imagine any meaningful benefit to allowing wireless air-to-ground communications. Personal space is already at a premium on commercial aircraft and when coupled with the general lack of wireless phone etiquette, would mean that flights would become even more uncomfortable and harder to endure. Generally I am against more regulation, but knowing the wireless operators and struggling airlines are eager to deliver this service to enhance revneue makes me favor a continued ban on such calls. "Noise pollution" is an area of growing concern and perhaps should be considered by the FCC on such rulings.
